Children of Incarcerated Parents
2018 National Conference

April 22-25, 2018
Phoenix, AZ
Imprisonment is a salient aspect in the lives of many American families, especially among African Americans and Latinos. More children in the U.S. are experiencing parental incarceration than those diagnosed with autism or juvenile diabetes. This issue remains largely invisible.

The Center for Child Well-Being at Arizona State University is in a prime position to bring attention and best practices in both program and policy to this issue. This conference is designed as an annual event in Phoenix building on existing knowledge resulting in an annual action agenda. Four tracks will be offered.

- Understanding the Impact of Parental Incarceration on the Child and Family
- Evidence of Program and Policy Effectiveness for Children of Incarcerated Parents
- Training and Support for Professionals who work with children of incarcerated parents
- Coordinating Multiple Agencies that Impact Children of Incarcerated Parents

About this conference

The ASU Center for Child Well-Being is hosting the inaugural National Children of Incarcerated Parents Conference to gather, share best practices and engage in action planning. This multidisciplinary conference will host more than 500 attendees to tackle critical issues, empower children and families of incarcerated parents for systematic change. We hope you’ll consider the benefits of sponsoring this important event—for your organization,
Supporting this conference helps children and families impacted by parental incarceration.

Support

This conference is driven by the need to support professionals from social work, criminal justice, behavioral health, corrections, probation, child welfare, lawyers, policy makers, advocacy, governmental agencies, nonprofit agencies, and faith-based organizations, and most importantly—children and families personally-impacted by incarceration.

With a greater understanding of these challenges, we have the opportunity to coordinate work being done across social services sectors to create more comprehensive, effective, and sustained services for children, their families and caregivers.

Varying sponsorship levels are available. The conference will launch with an evening Welcome Reception April 22.

Attendees are encouraged to network and develop partnerships to foster solutions.

The conference will be full of workshops, plenaries, and speakers addressing important issues that impact children and families.
Currently, there are approximately 2 million children experiencing parental incarceration. These are children living with another parent, kinship, foster care, or on their own. The 2018 National Children of Incarcerated Parents Conference Committee believes that every child deserves the love and support needed to grow and thrive.

Sponsors of the 2018 Children of Incarcerated Parents Conference will have an opportunity to reach more than 500 attendees! To be a part of this amazing opportunity, just complete and return the Sponsorship Form that is included in this packet.

About the Center for Child Well-Being

The mission of ASU’s Center for Child Well-Being is to advance child and family well-being. We believe society can collectively overcome challenges and make a difference by ensuring the health and well-being of its children. Drawing upon the expertise of faculty from across ASU’s research enterprise, we work to increase resilience among families and to build safer and more vibrant communities for young people. We do this through our work in four key areas: Research, Citizen Engagement, Workforce Development and Strategic Partnerships.
